In fact, in my experience, most of them have one. People who can live on $4 a day don't really need welfare. — tptacek That's not what I said. I said that there's a correlation between states that receive more federal welfare dollars and having higher minimum wage laws, and states that receive fewer federal welfare dollars and have lower minimum wage laws. The correlation is not specific to minimum wage laws, though. It could be that in general states with higher minimum wages have higher poverty rates. Also, I is another study of minimum wage laws and poverty. It concludes that minimum wage laws lead to a small decline in poverty, about 3%-4%. ----- daniehicollet I don't know if this is in line with the plan that you are trying to follow, but trying to simulate the economic effect on people is very difficult. While one can have a great idea, in the end it is very difficult to predict how people would react to a hypothetical set of circumstances. I thought a great example of this is the housing crisis in the US. One month before the burst of the housing bubble, analysts were predicting a 6% drop in home prices, and within a few days they were predicting a 25% drop. This is not unlike other industries that were also bearing witness to a massive change in economy. Also, the country that is funding this study is a good test case. They are an educated group, the idea is 3da54e8ca3
