CRM or customer relationship management is a category of software that focuses on managing a company's interaction with customers and includes sales, marketing, customer support, and customer service. It is commonly used to track customer information, but can be used for other purposes, such as purchasing or project management. CRM software automates many business processes by offering pre-built solutions for tracking and managing the customers, their accounts, and their interactions with a business. CRM software also aids in the sales process, providing detailed information about each prospect (including the possibility to send emails directly from the software). The CRM software's database can be integrated with other systems, such as accounting, to handle the entire business in a unified environment. Installing and using CRM software is a complex process that requires training. However, a properly implemented CRM software can lead to more efficient and effective business practices. CMS CRM CRM's are available in many industries, including manufacturing, retail, service, construction, financial services, healthcare, energy and utilities, telecommunications, hospitality, and professional services. Features CRM software allows companies to organize and manage customer interactions such as phone calls, emails, faxes, online transactions, and in-person visits. A modern CRM system often has features to help marketers interact with customers and to improve the efficiency of sales-related functions. Most CRM software applications include advanced marketing tools to enable companies to effectively communicate with customers and prospects, gather information from these contacts, and convert leads to sales. Other types of CRM software may include reporting features to enable companies to track sales, productivity, and marketing efforts. Basic CRM features The fundamental features of most CRM software are: Sales management Marketing management CRM database CRM server software History According to a Gallup report, by 2012 the CRM market was about $19.5 billion, a 2.8% increase from the year 2011. Borland C++ Builder Borland C++ Builder (formerly known as Borland Visual C++ Builder) is a commercial (though freeware) IDE developed by the software company Borland. It is an IDE for building applications in C++, Delphi and other related languages, although it also includes front-end tools for compiling and debugging applications written in C#, VB and C++. It was the first IDE to ship with a completely developed GUI builder and many of its other features. C++ Builder was originally conceived as an alternative to Microsoft Visual C++, which was too complex for some applications. Unlike Microsoft Visual C++, C++ Builder does not require Microsoft Windows NT or Windows 2000, and can operate under the older Windows 95, Windows 98 and Windows 98 SE OS. Since then, it has also been extended

System Requirements For CMS CRM:

Install Notes: Add-ons can make your game appear in the main list of mods, to be found in the launcher. They can also bring new features, functionality and possibilities to your game! Add-ons are used on multiple systems (note that the add-on doesn't need to be installed on every system - it's enough for just one machine to have it, and it will work there). If you use more than one system, you will need to install the addon on each system, even if the addon is already installed on other
