A: Let me start by saying that I don't get asked this question very often - people are usually looking for the same flavor profile that they get in a Boston roast. Nevertheless, if you live in a humid environment you can go ahead and experiment and you may be surprised at the result. The reason I say this is because if you don't do a proper brine you'll end up with dry turkey skin or turkey that tastes salty. If you do have enough time and are ready to make some major changes to what you are accustomed to, then follow this recipe. To start, I'd recommend brining your bird for eight to ten hours. For this brine, I used an equal amount of sea salt to kosher salt and for two tablespoons of salt I used about two and a half cups of water. During the brine stage, I would recommend using the bird uncooked and at room temperature. After brining, I would then dry roast your turkey in a preheated oven for at least two hours (or until an instant probe thermometer inserted in the thickest part of the meat reaches 165 degrees Fahrenheit). Take the thermometer out of the bird, wrap it with aluminum foil and immediately place it in an ice bath until it's down to room temperature. Once the bird is room temperature you can proceed with the finish. I just brushed the inside of the
