Projection: First Light is a 2010 short science fiction film written and directed by Tykwer. Starring Giorgio Cantarini, Julie Delpy, Anton Yelchin, and Sanaa Lathan, the film was made in 2008 but was released in 2010. The film takes place in a present day London, which has been taken over by an army of mechanical men similar to the silver robot-folk from Metropolis, as they face off against a team of four highly-trained female soldiers. A lawyer, a metal robot, a scientist, and a cyber-security programmer from the future try to escape the city before it falls apart. The film's plot is loosely adapted from the original first installment in the Flash Gordon comic book series, novelized by Alex Raymond, and TV series adaptations. As such, the story has been altered, and a large dose of Rothfuss's The Name of the Wind has been added. The film was premiered at the 2010 Cannes Film Festival and released theatrically in France and Germany in July 2010. Projection: First Light received positive reviews from critics, with some being impressed and some unhappy with the story. Plot The film opens with a description of a precipitous decline in Britain's carbon footprint, the eventual exhaustion of Earth's fossil fuel reserves, and the impending breakdown of the planet's biosphere. As the population of the country, and much of the world, grows precipitously, London begins to suffer from crime and urban blight. A new type of robot, operated by a digital computing system, is developed to combat crime and the threat of nuclear war with other countries. The new robots are government endorsed; it is pointed out that robots may fight each other if humans are not involved. The robots are given false memories of their origin as art-supplies robots operated by children in the future, to justify the mass-production of them. Their programming has the robots believing that humanity, for the most part, is untrustworthy and often violent, although children from the past are an exception to this claim. The robots also act with a degree of natural sophistry and, in some cases, a measure of hubris. One robot in the film, Omega, converts all of London into a city of utopia. The robots do not seem to have any sign of memory or programming regarding their previous lives, nor an ability for the wiser-than-human connections to their children. However, within a day, they have made their
