What's new in Space Survival:

? Mk II Stealth Tiger US Army MGTP-59 Tiger Tank "The Tiger is faster than we had thought. We would have to rapidly develop a more powerful and more effective anti-Tiger infantry weapon to counter it."General Martin Blumenreich Early February 1945, a new Tiger PzKpfw VE is sighted in the small town. Its engine smoking and its flank plates missing as if it had been badly damaged, the Tiger immediately catches the attention of the German High Command in Berlin. There is only one tank in the army. To make do with one howitzer, was most of their hope gone? It was 1943, when crews of the US 99th Infantry Division had started work on what many would call the most stubborn, intelligent and persistent tank in existence. During the years which followed most of these crews took turns on the upgrade program that would later be called the "Big Three." When the Big Three were completed, there were 68 Tanks on US Army strength. What they lacked - something obvious but not easily acknowledged - was the cannon the Tiger was equipped with. The M1917 10.5" Gun M1. The Tigers favor of that weapon can be argued. The official US Army version line up is: MkII, Sherman, M1 M3, Turret: The turret is identical to the M3 posthumously designated Tank, Turret M3 (TtM3) (Suz/Mk II). It is composed of the M3 Cupola and Mortar Carrier cupola. The opening in the rear of the hull contains an armored driver's hatch. The hull of the M3 was basic, intended for use in an infantry support role with a "Chateau Commission" Battalion of the 4th US Armored Division. The main armament for this vehicle was a 14.5cm KwK36 L/24 gun, which was mounted in a modified M4 75mm gun trunnion on a 105-degree L/16 high-velocity gun carriage. The first turret based on the M2 gun had been built by E-26 and baptised S-tank. One month before the armistice, the American industry responsible for converting the M2 to the M3 pattern began to develop a new pattern of tank turrets called 'M-46'. The resulting M-46 turrets were 28.8mm thick while the M-43 family were actually heavier at 29.
