By collecting data from over 100 players, the control system has taken a big step forward by more realistically replicating the physics of players in the game. During a real football match, players move naturally, displaying a fluidity and energy that is not possible in a VR experience. In addition to the player collisions and accelerations, FIFA 22 Activation Code gives the player a variety of new animations including a “zoom-in”, a close move and a “sponge kick”. In gameplay, one player uses the sponge kick to break into the box. The close move allows a player to shoulder the ball and aim shots. “Our goal is to allow players to feel as though they are controlling a real footballer,” said Fumito Ueda, Executive Director of Football, SEGA. “Our athletes are excited to play this game and give everything they have to the game.” More information on the motion capture suits worn by the players can be found in the E3 2017 FIFA trailer below. “While we introduced groundbreaking player motion capture technology with FIFA 19, FIFA 20 and FIFA 21, we are taking our motion capture research even further with this year’s game,” said Will Bede, Senior Producer of FIFA. “By collecting data from over 100 players, we’re able to more realistically replicate the physics of players in the game. We’re proud of the effort that goes into our football simulations and we think players are going to be blown away by the performance and fluidity of our footballers.” More details can be found on the game's official site, or the FIFA 20 site. Via [Kotaku]Q: Getting a Custom UITableViewCell to Auto Layout I have several nibs that create a scroll view with content, which is in turn a container. The container has a subview which is of type UITableView. In the nib file I have control-dragged from the UITableViewCell to create a custom UITableViewCell. I've dragged in a UILabel, UITextField and a UITextView. I'm using auto layout to size the UILabel and UITextField, which is fine. But I can't get the UITextView to position itself the way I want. It seems to just ignore all the constraints

1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a technique for creating management information in a storage system. 2. Description of the Related Art In recent years, storage management apparatuses that use a plurality of storage apparatuses, such as disk array apparatuses, as a virtual storage apparatus are being employed. This kind of storage management apparatus is required to assign the storage area of a disk to an application and manage the storage area as if it were one disk. For example, the Patent Document 1 describes a storage management apparatus that reduces the time necessary for execution of an operation to assign a storage area to an application. The Patent Document 1 describes a technique that reduces the processing of allocating a storage area to a disk on an application basis by associating the volumes that constitute a storage area (log volumes) with the applications. However, the storage management apparatus described in the Patent Document 1 uses each volume to constitute a storage area, and does not use the storage areas that are not allocated to the applications. Accordingly, the storage area management is performed only when an application of an application use volume has completed a write operation or a read operation, and consequently it is difficult to effectively utilize the storage area management of the storage management apparatus. In this regard, the Patent Document 2 discloses a technique that performs a volume management of a disk on a block basis and uses the volume management information to guide, for example, the configuration of data volumes assigned to an application. Further, the Patent Document 3 discloses a technique that reduces the number of
