ct of heart rate on the maximal aerobic power of runners. Peak is important in determining maximal oxygen uptake, but not commonly considered an important determinant. During competitive exercise, athletes often experience a wide range of heart rates (HR). During that competitive phase, many variables can influence peak performance. This article examines the influence of HR on the gas exchange variables that determine maximal oxygen uptake of a group of runners who participated in a state cross-country championship. Ten of the fastest runners (mean speed, 42.0 km.h⁻¹; mean age, 23.5 years; mean body weight, 68.0 kg) were selected for this study because their time trial course was largely flat and they remained approximately the same distance from the start to finish for each of the four races of the championship. Peak HR was determined for each runner, as was the oxygen uptake at peak HR. Compared to the values for runners of similar speed, peak oxygen uptake was lower and a wide range existed (46.6 to 73.2 ml.kg⁻¹.min⁻¹). There were, however, no differences in performance on the flat course between the HR group and two control groups of runners who finished at similar speeds but whose HRs were approximately 20% and 30% less than the HR of the HR group. The greatest value for maximal oxygen uptake was obtained by the runners whose HR was less than their peak HR. However, these runners also had the highest peak HR of all runners. There was no relation between peak HR and performance; therefore, peak HR is not an important determinant of maximal oxygen uptake of these runners. Spanish Prime Minister Mariano Rajoy said
