This invention is related generally to the field of dispensed chemicals and more particularly to devices for control of such dispensed chemicals. Soft sided dispensers are used for dispensing granular and particulate materials such as fertilizers, herbicides, lime, pesticides, insecticide, rust preventatives, and other chemicals, and for dispensing liquids such as soap, cleaning and polishing solutions, detergents, non-aqueous chemicals, lubricating and moisturizing liquids, and other liquids. Such dispensers are increasingly used in nurseries, gardens, and lawns as a simple and convenient way to control the application of chemicals in a controlled manner. For example, a plant gardener can dispense chemicals as needed simply by opening the dispenser and shaking it to release a desired amount of a chemical or powder into the plant gardens. The typical soft sided dispenser has a cover and base which are hinged or screwed together for dispensing the granular or liquid material. A portion of the dispenser base is hinged to the cover for opening, and the remainder of the base is mounted on the open side of the cover for supporting the cover above the base in the open position. The base generally has an opening therein through which the granular or liquid material is dispensed and the cover is used to shield the user from the chemical dispensed from the container. Although the soft sided dispenser is simple and convenient, it is also subject to high rates of in-use contamination. Contamination is particularly a problem in the area of the dispenser opening where the material is dispensed. Although the cover is closed when not in use, the chemicals dispensed and some of the liquids are subject to evaporation. Since the dispenser is typically used outdoors in the presence of the ambient air, it is subject to contamination by human and animal fecal matter, as well as dust, dirt, and grime. Moreover, the size and weight of the dispenser can make it difficult to
