Proteomic analysis of caecal contents of germ-free rats revealed an adaptation to a carnivorous diet. One of the major advantages of germ-free animals is their ability to adapt to novel diets. To gain insight into the molecular mechanisms underlying such an 'evolutionary novelty' of the gut, we investigated a long-term feeding study (109 days) of a germ-free (GF) rat, raised on a carnivorous diet with a protein level of 30% (CP30), in comparison with a conventional rat (CV) raised on a semi-synthetic diet (CP21). We utilized a label-free shotgun proteomics approach to detect differential proteins in caecum contents from GF compared with CV rats (n=4). Results showed differential abundance of 43 proteins with altered expression during, or after, adaptation. Functional clustering of all detected differential proteins into 14 clusters showed their involvement in a variety of biological processes. The majority of proteins were present in a single cluster, except for the citrulline-nitrogen cycle and fatty acid biosynthesis. An additional clustering of proteins with known molecular function was performed by constructing a network of protein-protein interactions. This approach c6a93da74d
