Made for people who wear orthopedic shoes (e.g. diabetes and arthritis shoes), these insoles are designed to correct your foot's natural shape by making your arch higher. Most insoles for walking shoes are designed for adults, but some are made for children. If you're going to buy insoles, make sure you get ones that have the right height; not all insoles are the same height. Shoe stores, also called shoe fitters, have varying degrees of experience. Not all will fit and measure your foot correctly. The best shoe stores are those that have a shoe fitting room and a fully trained staff. Many shops want to cut corners and outsource the work to their employees. If you're having trouble finding the right fit, ask someone at the store about a referral to a shoe fit specialist. After you've bought your shoes, store your insoles in the back rroom. Don't leave them in your car on a hot day. Ideally, the insoles should last as long as the shoes they go into. If they wear out before your shoes do, buy more insoles. If you wear insoles to work all day, check the insoles when you get home for wear and tear. There's a lot of controversy over the need for orthopedic insoles. Some doctors recommend putting insoles in shoes that don't require orthopedic insoles. Orthopedic insoles come in several types, including: Moist socks and orthopedic foot beds are two ways to make your insoles work better. The moisture helps keep the feet warmer, which helps them more effectively absorb the arch support. Moist socks may also contain various chemicals to inhibit the growth of fungi and bacteria that cause foot odor and nail infections. Inserting an Orthopedic Footbed An orthopedic footbed is a semi-rigid, rectangular or round polyfoam pad you insert inside of your shoe.
