CFPS has several advantages over conventional in vivo protein production methods, including the ability to generate complex eukaryotic proteins and to incorporate multiple heterologous genes into a single transcript. However, the main advantage of CFPS, namely, the ability to produce recombinant proteins at a cost-effective rate, is currently limited by the slow, stochastic synthesis of recombinant proteins (reaction initiation and protein elongation rates of about 30 to 50 molecules/minute) from mRNA templates. As a result, mRNA templates from which many proteins can be produced are required to produce the protein of interest. In contrast, the PCR-based genetic code expansion technique described by McCarty et al. (U.S. Pat. No. 5,736,296) allows for the efficient, stochastic, and cost-effective production of recombinant proteins. Genetic code expansion refers to the addition of non-canonical amino acid residues into a polypeptide of interest through in vitro incorporation of a preformed, chemically modified amino acid (pro-amino acid) in response to a heterologous transcription signal. In principle, pro-amino acids can be added to a protein sequence at any position in the polypeptide. The following pro-amino acid, chemical modifications have been shown to allow for the efficient and stochastic incorporation of non-canonical amino acids into polype

It is mainly used by Japanese imperials to show their rank and status. The crown is made out of yellow gold and is shaped like the Emperor's official headgear. During the reign of Emperor Meiji, the crown was made of pure gold. Later, with the symbolic change in the nation's status, the crown has gradually taken on the appearance of various other imperial symbols. The crown, originally made by the Fushimi kirifushi, is topped with a larger gold cap with the emblems of the Three Sacred Treasures on the top. The crown's visor is a separate component, serving as a protective device. The crown consists 04aeff104c
